POETRY

THE LIKENESS OF EVIL. Were I an artist I would paint Sin's likeness, neither tose nor wile; But fair as any haloed saint, In garments free from nay taint, Or outward show of guile,

Were I a painter I would paint
Sin as she is, not as she seems,
To starving monk and shaveling saint
Who tear their flesh and bleed and faint,
In horror haunted dreams.

Hell sends no dragons breathing fiame To lure our timid souls away. But sirens fair, who come to claim And whisper "For a day." And tempt us through our own desires
And while they tempt condemn,
Transmitted sins of guilty sires,
And worse than purgatorial fires
The pangs that follow them:

The demons of the ages done, Were old wives' fables, nothing more—
Black shadows that have one by one
Succumbed to reason's glorious sun,
And past forever more.

He is a maniac or dunce
Who wonders that so few disdain!
Who thinks the naked devil fronts
The soul he chooses and at once
Makes his intention plain!
—Arthur Goodenough, in Springfield
Republican.

ADVANCED SPRING HINTS FOR BIRDS. (By an incurable denisen of the menightingule and bobolink, And wren and robin, your technique, taken all in all, I think, Unique.

And yet you sing in hidden dales Where nobody can hear or see. Great Scott, how stupid nightingales Can be! What rural warbling on a rock
Or rill or tree or mountain range
Compares with singing at the Stock Exchange?

And why should robins waste their din Upon a fence, behind a shrub, When they might sing selections in A club?

-Thomas R. Ybarra.

So pay attention to my words.

A wealth of wisdom in them lies four future's in the city, birds;

Get wise:
